Domain

Anathon governs the cycle itself - the animating current that passes through all living things and the completion that follows when that current moves on. These are not two processes but one, as inseparable as the turning of a wheel. That Which Moves Through All and The Stillness That Comes After are not opposites. They are the same truth approached from either end.

Through Anathon's manifestations the full breadth of this cycle finds expression in forms that mortal minds can approach and understand. On the side of life - the healing of broken bodies, the nurturing of new souls, the fierce unstoppable vitality that pushes living things through adversity, and the darker expressions of life's hunger, the predator, the parasite, the consuming growth that takes without giving. On the side of death - the shepherding of souls through their transition, the keeping of what was, the granting of rest to those who have struggled long enough, and the darker expressions of death's authority, the wielding of endings as power, the cold calculus of those who decide which lives conclude and when.

All of these are Anathon. To exist is to carry That Which Moves Through All within you. To end is to know The Stillness That Comes After. Neither requires prayer. Neither requires devotion. The cycle does not move through you because you deserve it. It moves through you because that is what it does.

Origin

Myria had created countless things before she understood impermanence. Her early creations were made to last - she poured herself into them fully, willing them to persist, to endure, to fill the expanding universe with permanent testament to her own existence. It was Nos who showed her, without intending to, that permanence was not the highest virtue a thing could possess. Watching him move through her creation she came to understand something she had not known she was reaching for - that a thing which cannot end cannot truly be said to have lived. That the flower is beautiful because it dies. That the spark burns brightest in the moment before it passes.

But she also understood something else - that what Nos did and what she now intended were fundamentally different things. Nos unravelled. What she would create was not unravelling but completion. A universe in which things only began and were only destroyed was a universe without meaning, without weight, without the dignity that a true ending confers. The cycle she intended would give that dignity to everything that lived - the promise that nothing which had truly lived would simply be undone. That the ending was part of the thing itself, woven in from the first breath, waiting with the patience of something that had never needed to hurry.

From this understanding came Anathon - not born the way her stewards were born, from resolve or correction or care, but recognised. Myria looked at the truth of impermanence and the truth of completion simultaneously and gave them a single form, because they were always a single truth. That Which Moves Through All and The Stillness That Comes After arrived together, as they have always been together, as they will always be together. The cycle does not have a beginning. It does not have an end. It simply turns.
